The pitch surfaces are generated by swinging the generatrix through one revolution, first about the axis of one gear for the surface of that gear, and then about the axis of the other for its surface. Any corresponding portions of these hyperholoids can be used as pitch surfaces upon which to develop teeth of such a form that they will have line contact. When such teeth work together, they have a sliding motion over each other in the direction of the line of contact as well as the combined sliding and rolling motion which occurs in ordinary spur gearing. This end sliding causes considerable frictional losses and wear when any considerable amount of energy is transmitted, and is a serious objection to their use. The teeth are difficult and expensive to make on account of their form....
