We understood the threat situation. We understood the composition of the forces that faced NATO and other forces. But today, with weapons of mass destruction, the proliferation of weapons throughout the world, a far more complex threat situation faces this Nation. The subject of homeland defense is now very much a part of the responsibilities of the extraordinary team of national security that President-elect Bush has put together. Just think. Not since the days of World War II, when America experienced blackouts and when there was uncertainty of the enemy submarines off our shores, did we recognize that once again America is imperiled by the weapons of mass destruction, be it missile defense or chemical or biological. So, again, when and when not to use force. As I say, Iraq--at that time we had a coalition of dozens of nations that fought that..
