Excerpt: . . . 13 CHAPTER XXII. TORMOUTH. He had not wholly quenched his power, A little grain of conscience made him aour. Alfred Tennyson. But as he descended a whisper there fell; It was his good angel, who bade him farewell. Sir Walter Scon. I Have been compelled by the pressure of more important business to leave the Earl of Ducandraque and his reverend friend for a considerable time. I am sorry; sincerely sorry, for it, especially on the chaplains account, knowing as I do--and who does not--the exceeding uncomfortableness, nay, the imminent peril, of remaining so long in wet clothes after a thorough good ducking. I will, however, make all the amends now in my power. Sad, silent, and moody was their journey for the first two hours after their departure from the Rose and Crown. For the inferior felt utterly wornout by his exertions, and...
