In other words, they have been persuaded, by their love of God, by the obligations which bind them to the service of Christ, and by their regard for the salvation of immortal souls, to do what they may towards extending through the world the purifying and saving influence of Christian truth. In prosecuting this design, they find themselves compelled not only to contend with the hostility of open infidelity, and to endure an uncommon share of the mean-spirited abuse which is heaped on every noble undertaking, but also to meet the coldness and the frowns of men who call themselves the friends of Christianity, and whose habitual generosity might seem to ensure the most efficient co-operation. The reason of this is obvious. The enterprise, as I have...
